Statement of issues

The plaintiff has Question of Fact, and Conspiracy issues with all of the Defendants and The Federal Bureau of Investigation. Should the defendants be able to participate in this type of high-level retaliation and conspiracy against the Plaintiff Kyle Lydell Canty? Should the Administrative body of the U. S. District Court Western District of Washington At Seattle continue to turn their heads and act as if they do not know what this is really about?

Statement of Facts

1. Journalist Chad Pawson writes quote" A U. S. Citizen has argued before Canada's immigration and Refugee Board in Vancouver that he should be granted refugee status over fears that he will be killed in his home country by police because he is black."
2. Journalist Chad Pawson writes quote" Canty represented himself at the hearing, which he applied to have made public, and was commended by Yamauchi at its conclusion, who said that Canty had put together a "well prepared case and argued it as well as it could be."
3. Journalist Chad Pawson writes quote" I got bothered because I'm Black" he said. This is a history of false arrest. My name is ruined because of the false arrest."
4. Journalist Chad Pawson writes quote" I'm in fear of my life because I'm black," he told an IRB member Ron Yamauchi in a hearing on October 23rd in Vancouver. This is a "well- founded fear."
5. Journalist Chad Pawson writes quote" Canty argues Black People are being exterminated at an alarming rate in the U.S. and included examples such as the shooting of Michael Brown in Missouri and the death of Eric Garner in New York City at the hands of police.

6. Journalist Chad Pawson writes quote" Canty submitted a significant evidence package to the IRB including videos, media reports and the UNHCR's handbook on determining refugee status.

Conclusion

So tell me world, and members of the jury, does this civil case seem like conspiracy and retaliation to you when this article was written October 24, 2015, along with other articles describing the United States of America's hell hole that black people are living in at the hands of the police in the United States, then the plaintiff is targeted out by the police shortly after he returned to the United States, and then he was charged with two felonies against police?

Black U.S. citizen Kyle Lydell Canty seeks refugee status in Canada

A U.S. citizen has argued before Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board in Vancouver that he should be granted refugee status over fears that he will be killed in his home country by police because he is black.

Kyle Lydell Canty, 30, crossed into B.C.'s Lower Mainland in early September of 2015, telling border agents that he was here to visit and take photographs, but once in Vancouver decided he would apply to remain as a refugee.

"I'm in fear of my life because I'm black," he told IRB member Ron Yamauchi in a hearing on October 23rd in Vancouver. "This is a well-founded fear."

Canty argues that black people are "being exterminated at an alarming rate" in the U.S. and included examples such as the shooting of Michael Brown in Missouri and the death of Eric Garner in New York City at the hands of police.

Canty represented himself at the hearing, which he applied to have made public, and was commended by Yamauchi at its conclusion, who said Canty had put together a "well prepared case ... and argued it as well as it could be."

Canty submitted a significant evidence package to the IRB including videos, media reports and the UNHCR's handbook on determining refugee status.

In order for someone to be called a refugee in Canada, they must prove they are in danger in their home country, "that you're someone with a well-founded fear of persecution in your country, based on race, religion, nationality, political opinion or membership in a particular social group." said Melissa Anderson, who speaks for the IRB.

Born in New York, Canty has lived in six different states before arriving in Canada, a country he says he's never been to before.

Claims police harassment

He told the IRB that in every state he resided, police have harassed him and targeted him because of his race.

As part of evidence submitted to the board, Canty edited together multiple point-of-view videos of his interaction with police, including one where he was arrested for trespass in Salem, Oregon, when he spent two hours talking on the phone and using free Wi-Fi at a bus station.

"I got bothered because I'm black," he said. "This is a history of false arrest. My name is ruined because of the false arrest."

He described another video submitted to the IRB that shows a police car driving past him and then stopping.

Two officers emerge. Canty asks them why they are stopping. The officers reply they believed he was flagging them. When Canty says no, they depart without incident.

Yamauchi questioned Canty over whether or not this could be considered a negative, threatening interaction with police.

Canty admits that he has several outstanding charges in multiple states for things including jaywalking, issuing threats, disorderly conduct and resisting arrest but says he has no intention of returning to his home country to face those charges.

"I'm in fear of my life," he said. "I already know the outcome."

His goal is to stay in Canada where he says he feels safe and even comfortable enough to talk to police.

Canty wants to own a photography business and open a training centre for a martial art that he practises. Currently he is residing at a homeless shelter in Vancouver.

U.S. refugee seekers rare

No more than 10 U.S. citizens are granted asylum by the IRB in Canada each year. In 2013 there were only three.

Last year, the case of Denise Harvey made it all the way to Federal Court after an appeal by the government. She was convicted in the U.S. of having sex with a 16-year-old boy, but broke no Canadian laws and was granted asylum because the IRB agreed her punishment in the U.S. was cruel and unusual. The government appeal was unsuccessful.

IRB member Yamauchi has reserved his judgment on Canty's case.

If it is approved he can apply for permanent residency. If denied, removal from Canada is a possibility, but Canty says if he does not get a favourable result he will appeal.
